FISH DETERMINE FATE OF NATIONS, HE SAYS

Dr. James Howard Gore Tells Geographic Society Finny Species Helped Make History of Europe.

That the pride and wealth of great cities and nations literally depended to a high degree upon the vagaries of the herring in their migrations, was one of the interesting remarks in the story of "The Baltic and Its Shores," as told by James Howard Gore in a lecture before members of the National Geographic Society at New Masonic Temple last night. While the great herring schools came into the Baltic to spawn in its shoals, the Hansatic cities thrived and prospered, and when those fish changed their spawning grounds to Dutch waters, the Hansatic cities waned, while the Dutch built up a rich nation out of the proceeds of the herring catch.

There is a saying, the lecturer went on, that the great city of Amsterdam was built upon herring bones, and when it is considered what an important part this fish played in the commerce of the Middle Ages, there is little difficulty in accepting this metaphor at its face value. He explained that the fish industry was of tremendous significance in those ages before the advent of Protestantism, when all the people of Europe faithfully observed the fasts and the church regulations as to the consumption of meats.

Fish, however, have formed but a part of the vast commerce that has flowed out of Baltic regions from the stone age until today, according to the speaker. The trading on this water-body has always been significant, he said, not only second to that great traffic that in all ages has followed the lanes of the Mediterranean.

GOETHALS WANTS ARMS FACTORY NEAR CANAL

He Tells House Committee Opening of Channel Depends on Rapidity of Earth's Slipping.

Gov. Goethals, of the Panama Canal Zone, told the members of the House Appropriations Committee yesterday that out of the proceeds of the herring catch upon the rapidity with which the earth now slipping into the watery moves.

There are, he said, 8,000,000 or 9,000,000 cubic yards of earth to be taken out. This played in the commerce of the Middle Ages, there is little difficulty in accepting this metaphor at its face value. He explained that the fish industry was of tremendous significance in those ages before the advent of Protestantism, when all the people of Europe faithfully observed the fasts and the church regulations as to the consumption of meats.
